A Dragon, Eagle and Boiling Water

Devang Laddha explains the current conflict in the South China Sea.

For a long time now the South China Sea has been one of the most disputed regions in the world, with as many as six countries laying claim over it. Thought to house vast resources of natural gas and oil as well as being responsible for carrying out trade worth almost 5.3 trillion dollars, the region has definitely become one worth fighting over. However, the recent militarization of the region by China, ignoring diplomatic talks and breaking international rules has been something that has not only put the region under great scrutiny but has also called for action from countries, especially the United States of America.

Over the past year, China, which claims a major chunk of the Sea as its own has asserted its power in the region and increased tensions between all neighbouring nations. It has done this by increasing the number of patrol ships sent into the region and by reclaiming land, something which is considered a blatant violation of the established United Nations Convention of the Law of Sea (UNCLOS). Along with the reclamation of land, China has also militarized the region by constructing airstrips and placing surface to air missiles in the region - thus putting it in under the scanner.

This militarization is being seen as an infringement upon the sovereignty of the south-eastern nations. Obviously, the response of these nations has been one of outrage, especially since China's actions directly threaten their international trade. Moreover, with patrol ships escorting Chinese fishing fleets, the smaller nations have not been able to exploit the sea for its various resources, especially fish and natural gas. As a result, it is being increasingly felt that what China is doing amounts to bullying and stealing. China has also repeatedly refused to indulge in multilateral talks, choosing instead to hold bilateral talks with countries that bring very little to the discussion table with regards to their size and strength. This is where the United States steps in. Being one of the most powerful countries in the world, America has the added responsibility of enforcing UN conventions. It is for this reason that the United States has decided to make its presence felt in the South China Sea, not only to give support to the beleaguered smaller nations, who are allied to it, but also to keep China from outrightly taking over the region and increasing its economic and military strength.

However, even with the US intervening, the issue at hand should be seen for what it is - an issue threatening the entire world order. China, being a country with great power has refused to listen to its neighbours. It has refused to cooperate in any way and has also refused to listen to the International Court of Arbitration in The Hague, the court where the Philippines has lodged its complaint. Thus, China, as of now stands as a country that refuses to listen to the mechanisms of world order and lives off the strength of its supremacy, even while the US tries to keep it at bay. China cannot be left to establish its supremacy for two reasons: the precedent that it sets and the consequences of leaving this unchecked. Letting the Chinese do as they please will lead to further expansion and, as seen in the past, will lead to oppression. Thus, the US and other countries have to start a dialogue with China and have to deal with the situation to find a solution. Local countries also need to be active rather than be intimidated by China. They have to take a stand against such bullying. China cannot be allowed to dominate its smaller neighbours because the world cannot afford to have another war based on the expansionist ideas of a particular country.

Letter To The Editor

Dear Weekly,

Doscos have almost always been aware of the inequalities that exist in the world, and it is this awareness that makes them want to change the world. This idea is a result of the principles of equality that form the cornerstone of our ethos, the sense of a level-playing field that underscores our ideals meshed with the exposure that the students receive in their time here. Given the reputation that Doon and its principles have, it has had to very rarely justify, or even defend its existence as an all-Boys school. Or so I thought till I read on our School's webpage the justification for the same, which features reasons like "Boys are creative, Boys are funny, Boys make great leaders", in a tone that almost left the reader with the implication that Girls are neither creative nor funny and without the qualities to become great leaders. It wasn't so much our justification that got my attention but the casual sexism in the manner in which the points were phrased. It was almost as though the School, known for its social service and work towards women empowerment, was using cultural and gendered stereotypes to justify its existence as an all-Boys school.

The link to this page runs through another page which claims Doon to be "Best Boys Boarding School" and after reading out-of-context and gendered generalizations makes me want to question that notion. Statements like "Boys mature later than girls—physically and socially" talk about societal pressures on boys in the real world - but which society are we talking about? Demographical studies suggest that children, not just boys, do grow differently, both physically and socially, across different societies. Even if we look at India, there are a number of different societies and places where students come from, and to generalize is to hold the entire School to a single thought process which contributes to the same inequalities and cultural conditioning that we are taught to do away with.

The page justifies how boys are creative and participate in activities like 'choir', because a boarding school allows them to be away from the distractions and the need to impress girls. That is not only inherently derogatory to girls, labelling them as distractions but also factually incorrect. The Vienna Boys' Choir, the Wilten Boys' Choir and the Apollo Boys' Choir are some of the best choirs in the world and all feature only boys who live and have grown up in a co-ed world. The fact that an individual was surprised looking at boys singing in choirs is exactly the kind of cultural conditioning and stereotyping that we must do away with instead of using it to defend our existence.

The page also uses Daniel Goleman's work to justify how boys, because of their sense of humour, make great leaders but the manner in which it is phrased makes it look as though quotes are cherry picked to suit this patriarchal point. Goleman has done enormous work in emotional intelligence, and self-deprecating humour is only a very small part of empathy which is one of the five components of emotional intelligence. In fact, he says that, according to Ruth Mallory, who has worked on emotional intelligence with regard to the top ten percent of business leaders, there is almost no difference in men and women at all. Asserting the differences between boys and girls because of acquired traits like humour and leadership feeds into the stereotype that Doscos are encouraged to consign to the past.

"...men, working alongside our women teachers, will make a huge difference in the boys' lives and show that being a man is about many things, not a few characteristics and caricatures promoted by popular culture." This line sounds almost ironical given what the rest of the page seems to be talking about. It talks about teaching boys about what "being a man" is all about but isn't the very notion of "being a man" meant to be done away with in a community that is looking to bring about gender equality and untwist twisted and ancient cultural ideals? Surely, it is important only to know what it is to be humane and to understand our position and our accountability to our shared humanity?

Every Dosco has the potential to be the living embodiment of the principles that The Doon School seeks to ingrain in its students. The message that this page puts out into the world paints the School in a colour that was never in conjunction with what the School believed, or will ever believe in. We are custodians of the School's principles and this page reflects those ideas which clash with those principles. Given our position as members of this community, I would implore us all to rise above the considerations of gender and not let our horizons be limited by stereotypes. And to believe that, as a friend put it - "Children are creative, Children are funny, Children make great leaders."

Yours Sincerely,

Krishna Lohiya

State Elections | Kanishkh Kanodia

Over the course of the next three months, four states along with a union territory will elect their leaders. As the fight for seats is heating up, voters in Assam, West Bengal, Tamil Nadu, Kerala and Pondicherry are embracing themselves for the flood of campaigns and rallies about to come their way. In a time where the nation is engulfed with fierce debates over nationalism and religious intolerance, these polls will be very important, simply because they will showcase which ideologies have appealed to the citizens of the respective states.

On one hand we have the BJP which, without any major alliances is trying to single-handedly gain control over the State assemblies. After a staggering defeat in the Bihar and Delhi state assembly polls, the party will be hoping to gain back the lost momentum in the upcoming elections. The BJP is expected to make headway in Assam, despite stiff opposition from the INC, which has been in power for the past fifteen years. These polls will also help the BJP gain majority in the Rajya Sabha, thereby enabling them to pass the bills which have been stalled due to their lack of majority in the Upper House.

Stakes are high for the INC as well, being in power in two of the four states. After a humiliating General Election, the party is looking forward to a fourth consecutive win in Assam. Even though in West Bengal the party has formed an alliance with the CPI(M), in Kerala these allies will be the ones turning against each other. It is highly unlikely that their conflicting interests in Kerala will create space for the formation of a cohesive long-lasting coalition in West Bengal.

However, these elections aren't just confined to these two national parties. The TMC, the AIADMK and the AINRC have retained their supremacy in their respective states. While the 'Didi' magic has continued to sway people in West Bengal, 'Amma', in spite of being impeached from the office twice, has preserved her control over Tamil Nadu through massive propaganda. After the split of the DMK in Tamil Nadu, an AIADMK win won't come as a surprise to many. However, the TMC will face the resistance of the CPI(M)-INC alliance, which despite being a new fragile coalition might be able to narrowly win the elections in Bengal.

Conclusively, the upcoming elections will not only affect the state politics but will also influence the Centre to a great extent. The next two months will determine whether there will be a Centre dominated by a single party at both levels or will the system of two Houses continue to function as it currently is.
