Adieu!

The Doon School Weekly bids farewell to Ms Kamal Kapoor. On this occasion, her friends, colleagues, and pupils share their thoughts on her time spent here.

When Ms Kamal Kapoor joined the School, she had very large shoes to fill — those of her predecessor. I was quite apprehensive whether the next Oberoi House Dame could take on the role with the same verve. I am so glad to say that she surpassed all my expectations as a Housemaster. I found Kamal to be passionate about her work and that, I think, is the key for anyone to utilize their skills most efficiently. She showed organization and communication skills, a willingness to go the extra mile and always took ownership of her work. She was also instrumental in putting up the photo gallery and refining the seating arrangement of the House, things that will remain even after she leaves. Above all, she exhibited immense care for everyone around her, especially for the boys, and strived to maintain a happy environment in the house. Alongside that, she also maintained discipline amongst the Oberoi House boys and played an important and instrumental role in their development. I commend her for the quick learnability she has demonstrated and wish her happy learning and working in the future.

-MMR

Having joined the School in C Form, the first adult at School that I interacted with was the Dame. I recall very distinctly, Ma'am was admonishing one of the bhaiyas in the Linen Room. As I spent more time in the House I got increasingly more accustomed to hearing her voice emanating from the linen room, telling bhaiyas to get work done: particularly cleaning our rooms and the pantry. In the CDH as well, she would spend nearly every meal at the C and B Form tables — sitting there to make sure we eat the bananas given at breakfast or whatever vegetables there were at lunch, simultaneously reassuring us that by the time we reach our S and Sc Forms, she'd give us more independence. Little did we know that by the time we began our Sc Form, Ma'am would've left School. Ma'am has been a staple of our School lives, from forcing us to get our hair cut or reprimanding us for not clipping our nails or even going to her place to have late-night conversations (accompanied by Coke, of course), it'll be displeasingly odd to not have her around as we go about our day to day business. I'd just like to take this time to thank Ma'am for everything she has done for my Form and me. I wish her the very best in her future endeavours.

It just seems like yesterday when I met KLK. Time flies away in the blink of an eye. A trip down memory lane, I can still see the scintillating smile on her visage and warmth in her embrace as she welcomed me to O House House-Feast. That is when we first met and then on made some memories that I cannot forget. If you talk of poise and grace there is no one who could take her place. In addition to her professionalism, her persona is also something everyone wishes to possess. She is a conscientious, committed and talented person at her best. Wishing her infinite accomplishments and all the very best!

- HTA

I have been a happy member of the Oberoi household for my coming eighth year now and I have also worked with KLK Ma'am since the start of her journey in School. She has always been the ideal role model for not only me but also the other staff members and most of all the House boys. Although the boys were definitely a little scared of her, she had always equally loved and cared for them to the sky's extent. All my colleagues and I are more than satisfied with what we provided to the House under her direct guidance. I was reminiscing about the day when Ma'am had just stepped inside the House for the first time and I had shown her around the place; but as she got thoroughly acquainted with the House and customs, I realised I was the one learning and following her example.

Ideal Idols

Neel Sahai discusses the concept of role models and idols.

In today's day and age, where social media rules the world, we often idolise people based on the fact that they are famous, important or influential. The fact that the majority of the younger generation idolise famous personalities due to their physical traits or their presence on social media leads me to the conclusion that the term 'role model' or 'idol' is too loosely used. The crux of the term 'role model' is a 'person who is looked at by others as an example to be imitated'. However, in my eyes a role model is not only someone you want to imitate, a role model is a person who you want to learn from.

They say the journey is what makes a man, not the destination; this journey is what we need to value, not just the end product. Understanding the merit, the struggle and the perseverance one needs to make it in this world is what really matters, not the number of followers one has on social media.

No matter where we are in life, we can always learn from people around us, and we as an institution tend to undervalue scholars and artists. The work ethic, the time and effort an artist might put into a painting isn't understood, but the discipline and work ethic of a sportsman is always admired.

A good mentor and role model can pave an individual's path to success, whereas one who acts in self-interest may be detrimental to an individual's growth, therefore the true value of a mentor is priceless. We may learn from multiple mentors, where every person has a story, and each story has a conflict. Now to get through that conflict every individual makes mistakes. These mistakes are what we can learn from, and with every story, we learn from, we grow. These stories are constantly changing and whether it is the story of a scholar or the story of an actor, we can always learn and this learning is more than advice, it's based on the core values of a person, the rigour and the principles a person abided by to succeed.

Everyone loves a good underdog story, a story from rags to riches, however, the thing is most people fail to see the journey behind the scenes and the work it truly takes to succeed in whatever field you maybe in. Every underdog has their own idols and mentors who helped them succeed.

For example, Sundar Pichai, the Chief executive officer of Alphabet stated his parents spent a year's salary to send him to the United States so he could study at Stanford, where a bag cost the same as his dad's monthly salary. This story like most underdog stories is an inspiring one, however, the journey in between is where we can learn the most. In the same way, we can look at Lionel Messi's story, from suffering due to a growth hormone deficiency, with his parents having barely enough money to sustain themselves, to a stage where his talent and hard work took him to the level of success that most can only dream of.

Let's not be Career Crazy!

Krishnav Sachdev talks about the role of career counselling, especially for students of today.

Hours of stressing about college admissions while participating in as many activities as you can, in the hopes that it will help you become a better candidate for selection into the institute of your choice. You worry that getting into an average college will tarnish your social standing and make you appear to be a failure in comparison to your peers. Thus, as you drive yourself insane while spending large sums of money in the process, you forget to step back and take a breath. A pause for deep self-reflection, for thinking about whether it's worth being so stressed out for things you might not particularly love, about activities that career counsellors or Seniors told you would bring a lot of depth to your CV, increasing your chance of getting into a good college. Yet, it's something that doesn't really make you happy, just a bit more dismayed.

To be honest, this can be seen as a new phenomenon in the world. Twenty years ago, how do you think a person would respond if someone said that they were writing two research papers, heading a social service initiative, playing various sports at high levels, excelling at various co-curricular activities, while academically being a consistent topper? Yep, a definite Ivy League candidate, and yet, in the present day, there are probably thousands of people across the world who might be at the same or higher level of excellence. Thus, what will actually make the difference between landing the Ivy League and admission into a regular, good college? In search of this indefinite answer, many career-counselling services have been opened that outline a student's entire school journey, mapping out exactly what could give them a higher chance at landing in that dreamland.

That's not to say career counsellors are redundant; in fact, they are important people in anyone's life because they have professional knowledge and can lead new graduates and students toward a better route. Since they have certain expertise in the subject and have relevant experience in the market and industry, they can place their clients' talents, strengths, weaknesses, experience, and qualifications into a broader context, taking into account their hobbies, interests, and other factors. Many people are able to find the proper path and counselling with careers because of this. This guidance is advantageous because inexperienced people are able to pick the appropriate road and go towards success without getting distracted.

In this ever-accelerating world, a new normal is emerging where people are rushing after highly-acclaimed degrees and programs earlier and earlier in their lives so that they can lead a more enviable life for the better part of their time. Thus, as students growing up in this era, we can't help but flock like moths to certain activities that have been known to be good for our resumes. And, in doing so, we often reach out to career counsellors, who, despite their best intentions, cannot guarantee that their strategies will be effective.

Most of the current working population never had the chance to avail of career counselling in their growing up years, and still had to manage to find their calling. We, however, are exposed to so much, much earlier on, and are having to make major life decisions before we even graduate. This wasn't the case with most adults of today; they had to study all the subject areas so that they could keep their options open, meaning they could try anything until they found something that really spoke to them. In today's world, however, the need of the hour is to develop a focused approach right from the get go, keeping in mind the much wider choice and far stiffer competition of our times. So, if your interest lies in liberal arts, you would not have to still study chemistry or biology at great depth. In this scenario, the career counsellor is going to be helpful in identifying that interest and making that choice.

So, counselling definitely seems like a helpful thing, but unless you are cautious, you could fall into the trap of not having to think for yourself. While counsellors are only trying to help you out, they don't know what is going on inside your head. What, to the counsellor, seemed like a good idea at the time, might turn out to be something you don't enjoy because all you did was tell them about yourself and let them pick for you without really thinking about it yourself.

Overall, I believe that career counselling is a very important and positive service for any student as long as they are engaged in the process. As long as they have a say, because, in the end, it's your life and it's what you have to deal with. It can help you clarify your thoughts and organise your life, but if you don't set boundaries and don't share your thoughts, counselling will end up being unhelpful to you.

So please visit the careers office, get a professional opinion and utilise the amazing resource we have at our fingertips to its full potential. But at the same time, do remember to speak your mind and be entirely involved in the decision-making for your own life. Most importantly, make the most of the freedom of choice that you now enjoy, to make a choice that will make you happy now, and in the future.

The Saint and The Dragon

Yash Adalti reviews the book: The Priory of the Orange Tree.

How I first encountered The Priory of the Orange Tree by Samantha Shannon was, surprisingly, through a bookmark. The bookmark struck me as uncharacteristically large and needlessly bulky and thus remains fondly etched in my memory. Later, at a book fair, I managed to get my hands on it and was overjoyed to discover such a fresh turn in the often-traversed world of fantasy fiction.

It had a well thought-out plot which doesn't turn on itself with all its twists and turns and changing character perspectives. Surprising for the scope of its story, since it brings about intricate details and ideas while brimming with lush language, making it feel like multiple books stitched into one.

Its story features a whole host of characters suffering from distinct issues, ranging from what could be called a dragon-rider to a doctor, exiled due to delusions of immortality. What's amazing is the author's ability to handle such a large cohort of characters, and address each and every one of them, doing justice to their development throughout the novel.

She makes us understand the characters and lets us see the maelstrom of emotions that they are struggling with so that when disaster decides to strike, we're well prepared to jump off the sofa and yell "NO!".

This is only possible due to the bond the writer develops between the reader and the characters. In fact, when I finished reading, I had the strange experience of looking up from the pages, feeling dreamy and obscure and so keenly aware of the world around me, almost to an abject degree. The same sensation of waking up just as the final traces of some delightful nighttime adventure dissolve into the waves like salt. This, I've come to realise, is the hallmark of a great book.

In fact, when I finished reading, I had the strange experience of looking up from the pages, feeling dreamy and obscure and so keenly aware of the world around me...

The author's preoccupation with language, the experimentation with the narrative structure, the minute turns of characters and their decisions, the network of shifting relationships, and how all those ripples influence people on different continents are the book's greatest success for me. Shannon takes a variety of tales and transforms them into something vivid and fresh. The author makes certain that the readers are constantly learning about the numerous nations, cultures, and histories that make up this wide, sweeping universe. Moreover, the author draws its stories from folktales and myths found all over the world, adding to the book's lush diversity in the environment, as well as the cultures found on different continents. She accomplishes all this with such love and zeal for the world she's built, that I couldn't help but be mesmerised.

The book also features a plethora of fantastical creatures including talking animals and magic trees, much like other books of high fantasy fiction. However, it's unique because it features a unique view of dragons that I've never encountered in any other book; a view that regards them as superior creatures, beings to be worshipped, instead of being slain. Creatures that instead of being the guardians of heaven, are heaven itself.

Although the book does not fail to deliver in terms of advancement of the plot and character development, as I neared the end of the book, I couldn't help but feel let down. It seemed as though she had simply given up on trying to progress the book and just wrote what needed to be written to end the book without completely ruining it.

The "big bad monster" foreshadowed throughout the entire book, quoted to be feared by all, overwhelming the characters to the point they put their differences apart was struck down in only a handful of pages! The epic battle between the incarnation of evil and the forces of good lasted only a few pages, as long as negotiations or a simple exchange of gossip in the royal courtroom. After reading the book and putting it down, I was left with disappointment and dejection, leaving me questioning the ending and why it was so terribly written. Yet, what let me down the most was how the author thought that her readers would be satisfied with a simple "monster comes, weak point found, the monster killed". In a nutshell, while I was left with an intense feeling of dissatisfaction after putting the book down, I was also simultaneously pacified because the author had the courage to broach topics like sexuality and to include characters who weren't made with the same mould as every other character in the genre. Overall, I'd say I enjoyed the journey, yet felt slightly underwhelmed at the destination, and would recommend this book to anyone with a passion for high fantasy fiction like Lord of the Rings or Game of Thrones.

The Week Gone By

Saatvik Anand

This week started off on a rather interesting note as the School heard about a certain master's late-night drives resulting in the Gentlemen-duo's plans to explore the long-forgotten world outside the walls of Chandbagh come crashing down upon them. On Tuesday, kurtas and warm embraces dotted the campus as boys lined outside Masters' homes in hopes of getting a taste of freshly cooked meals in celebration of Eid-ul-Fitr.

Sadly, the thoughts of returning back to our normal schedule were once again crushed as more COVID-19 cases managed to make their way into School sending another set of Doscors for their seven-day retreat at the Mango Tree Courtyard.

Meanwhile, Masters and students alike can be found hopping from their houses to the Rosebowl as they prepare for the upcoming Inter-House dance, music and drama competitions. In the interim, the upcoming SATs have found Sc Formers running between Toyes and the Careers Department as the practice tests serve them with a harsh reality check. It seems like the battle for positions is still on as House representatives can be seen forming allies, hoping to secure a seat as secretaries of the various councils. On the other hand, sighs of relief can be heard all over campus as the occasional wind and rainfall give us a much-needed break from the scorching summer heat. The Sc Form can be seen leading their teams for the first time as Wednesday saw the start of the much-anticipated Inter-House hockey tournament.

As we slowly trudge towards the last few weeks of this seemingly never-ending term, I wish my fellow Doscors the very best of luck with the upcoming board examinations and Inter-House events.
